My dear Sir,

I hope this will be proceeded, by a full sheet which I sent last week & will cost you nothing.

If ~~you~~ do, perhaps you will excuse me making you pay for once, for a short letter. I cannot depend upon a speedy frank, & the King's business requires haste.

I have a letter signed David Erskine. The Writer says he has seen a letter of mine to Janet Ram <sup>(as I suppose)</sup> & wishes me to write to him. He seems in great distress of mind, & perhaps ~~I~~ ought to notice it.

But he says he is the son of Doctor Erskine, but there is such a total want of Education visible in every line, & he appears so very ignorant of propriety, that I shall not expect from the son of such a Father I must therefore beg you, as he says you know him well to give me a little bit of his history, that I may know how to write to him. If he had not mentioned D<sup>r</sup> Erskine name, I should not have wondered so much - How could he spend his Childhood & Youth, to be so very illiterate?

He filled a sheet in a large hand, sealed & directed it, & then enclosed it in another sheet, which contained little more than a repetition of what he had written in the former. So that I paid double postage, without obtaining any new information for my money.

I have little now to add since my last. Your Missionaries are gone. I was sorry I could not see them again. But I can not only pray but hope for them, as they will have the benefit of Mr. <sup>Macaulay</sup> ~~Bentley's~~ Mr. Clarke's advised information, before they enter upon their business. I could wish there were such men as Mr. Macaulay & Clarke at Stabroek, ready to receive our London Missionaries on their arrival.

I hope my next letter will be longer, & come free. Excuse me this time.

We form in love
Yours indeed

I acknowledge my debts to W<sup>r</sup> Buchanan & W<sup>r</sup> Black. Beg them to have patience with me, & I hope to pay them before long.
